BILL OSBORNE

MOUNTAIN MAN

© Bev Stone 1982

CHAPTER 3

Last month's story ended with Bill Osborn ordered to fulfill his trapping contract with Frances Payette and go to an assigned area in Snake River Valley, there to stay until a messenger was sent to tell him where to take the furs for pick-up.

He left under duress, full of resentment and anger at Payette's apparent disapproval of his romance with Payette's granddaughter, Lizzie Pattee, who was several years younger. He was certain Payette only wanted him out of the way so his one-time friend, George Goodheart could win Lizzie.

Goodheart! Bill no longer felt friendship toward him, only anger, which turned to hatred. He knew Lizzie would be with George the minute he left. She had already been trying to gain his attentions. And he knew it would be Goodheart who came to tell him where to deliver the furs. This was his area.

Bill's actions and behavior had changed radically from the calm, contented, helpful person he had been to a man brooding in anger, hatred and paranoia bordering on insanity. He felt his whole existence was threatened.

He knew he had to make changes in the way he lived. He had seen it coming for a long time. Too many immigrants were moving west. He hated them all. They were forcing changes he didn't want. He had never been a person to be totally alone. When other trappers left to find new ways, he had taken Bright Face. With her he was able to have companionship and maintain his hunter-gatherer lifestyle.

But Bright Face was an Indian. This new world would not accept a "squaw man." She couldn't help him adapt to white man's civilized ways.

With Lizzie it was different. She wasn't like other white women he had seen. She loved the West and the rugged life it required. She could ride and trap and loved cooking over a campfire. She was a good cook and she knew how to make buckskin suits. She was pretty. She understood his way of life and could help him merge into the changes that were coming.

In his mind, she was the only way out. He had to have her. He couldn't live without her. He turned Bright Face out of his life.

When he arrived at the trapper's cabin, he unpacked his gear, gathered his traps and headed toward the river. Many years of trapping had made him so expert; his movements were automatic as he opened the traps, baited and secured them. His mind was on Lizzie and George.

He began to plan George's murder. He would have to be clever, since George would be expecting trouble and was very expert at reading signs. It had to be a perfect plan.

At the fort, Bill's worst fears were being realized. Lizzie was indeed seeing more of George. He was young and handsome, and courteous. She had given Bill no encouragement. She was friendly, but that was all. He was too old. She knew Bill liked her, but she had no idea how much.

George had never cared much for the ladies. There was no room in his life for a woman. He hadn't been around a girl his age for some time and Lizzie made him experience feelings that were new to him. But he was a man of honor and felt circumstances had given him an advantage over Bill. The feelings he had for Lizzie seemed a betrayal, but Bill had Bright Face.

Bill's sudden change toward him had confused George at first. He was not guilty of Bill's resentment, but could not convince him. As Bill had become more hateful, George had avoided him. Now that Bill was gone, and he was receiving Lizzie's attentions, George began to understand why Bill had never mentioned Bright Face to anyone. Lizzie seemed to be all that a man of the west could want. He tried not to become interested in her, but between the small confines of the fort and Lizzie's friendly nature, it was unavoidable.

The time arrived for George to ride out and deliver the rendezvous messages. Friends tried to persuade him to send someone in his place. There were persistent rumors that Bill was out of his mind with jealousy and would kill George, but George insisted on going. It was his duty and he was afraid of no man although he knew there would be a showdown. He would have to get the drop on Bill or be shot. He loaded his guns, packed his horses with supplies and left for Bill's camp.

The weather had been stormy. There was an early, heavy snow in the mountains. As George neared the trapper's cabin, he became very cautious. He knew Bill would be expecting him, but not on any certain day. The snow forced him to travel slowly. It appeared the trail had not been used in some time. While still some distance away, he dismounted and tied the horses to go the rest of the way on foot. The chances of surprising Bill would be much better if he didn't hear the horses.

Finally, he could see the cabin through the trees. There was no smoke from the chimney. It appeared to be deserted. He approached carefully, keeping out of sight. Soon, he was at the door. The latchstring was outside, indicating Bill was gone. It could be a trap. He stood to one side and pushed the door open. Nothing. He entered the cabin and looked around. The ashes in the fireplace were cold. There was plenty of meat jerky and a large number of mink and beaver pelts, so trapping had been good and Bill was planning to return.

At least Bill wasn't brooding in the cabin as George had feared, or so out of his mind he couldn't function as evidenced by the jerky and large amount of fur pelts. There was a trapper's shelter upstream about ten miles. It was always stocked with wood and some provisions for use when a trapper was unable to complete checking his traps and get back to the cabin before nightfall or a storm. Bill must be there.

George went back to get the horses and took them to the cabin, planning to stay there that night and leave for the shelter at daybreak. After hobbling the horses on good grass, he went into the cabin, pulling the latchstring inside. He then went to sleep with his pistol close at hand.

By daybreak, he was headed toward the shelter. That trail had not been used recently either, a fact that puzzled George. He made slow progress due to tree-falls and rocks, but by noon was near the shelter. He could smell smoke. Bill was there all right. He was being very cautious, and was certain Bill did not know he was approaching.

But George had underestimated Bill, whose mountain-trained ears had picked up the sound of horses hooves on the rocks as they crossed the stream while still some distance away. He had his gun ready and was waiting.

George quietly approached the three-sided shelter from the blind side. He could see the campfire and a stick being poked into it to position the wood. He knew he would have to get the drop on Bill to avoid bloodshed. As George stepped around the shelter, Bill fired his gun. The shot grazed George, but he jumped on Bill and grabbed the gun away from him, surprisingly easily.

Only then did George realize Bill was in bad shape. Questioning revealed Bill had injured his leg several days earlier. Unable to walk, he had crawled to the shelter and remained there. He had kept the fire going because of the wood supply, but had run out of food. His foot was frozen and the leg swollen and ugly looking. It looked broken. George tried to set the leg, and which caused great agony for Bill. He dressed the wound, which took some time, then prepared some food.

Bill didn't want George's help. He hated George and still meant to kill him and told him so every few minutes, but George persisted. He fashioned a travois out of some sturdy young trees and managed to load Bill onto it. He wasn't in much shape to protest. They headed back toward the fort, George riding the horse pulling the travois, the other horses behind.

The trail had been difficult before, but with the travois was nearly impassable. George had to clear many obstacles. The travel was rough on Bill, nearly done in with pain and obsessed with killing George. They finally had to stop for the night. George didn't dare sleep. He kept the guns away from Bill and tried to talk to him but it seemed useless.

The next day they arrived at the fort where they were met by many friends who had expected the worst. Bill was taken to the doctor where he remained for several weeks. His wounds responded to treatment but his mind was intent on killing George. He had to be watched carefully.

After several weeks his ravings against George stopped and he became quiet. The doctor released him, but he avoided George and Lizzie. One day he was gone. No one had seen him leave. After some time, the incident was forgotten by everyone but George who wondered what had become of his one-time friend.

Early in the spring of 1862, George Goodheart and Lizzie Pattee made plans to be married. The wedding, held in the quarters of Lizzie's grandfather, Frances Payette, drew guests from near and far. George and Lizzie were well liked by white men and Indians alike. Many Indians set up their lodges near the fort preparing for a big celebration dance after the wedding ceremony. Three strange Indian lodges were set up during the night before the wedding.

The small wedding party was gathered in Payettes's quarters and the ceremony was about to begin when there was a loud knock on the door, and Bill Osborne entered the room, accompanied by Bright Face.

He walked straight over to George, grabbed his hand and shaking it warmly, asked if his old friend could forgive him for what he had done. Nothing else needed to be said. George shook his hand eagerly, and their friendship was renewed. No one asked Bill why he had a change of heart. No one needed to know but Bill.

After the ceremony uniting George and Lizzie, Bill and Bright Face decided to be married. The ceremony was held then and there making them man and wife in the white man's way. A huge celebration was held lasting well into the night.

BAND REVIEW

Royal Bliss is modern rock with equal parts beauty and tragedy. The band has already been through enough to justify their own VH1 Behind The Music episode complete with addiction, near death experiences, car crashes, and law suits.

Hailing from Salt Lake City, Royal Bliss gradually came together after high school when guitarist Chris Harding stumbled into a pizza parlor where frontman Neal Middleton was playing a solo gig. "I told Chris I would love to sing in a band and he invited me to jam with his band at a rehearsal" says Middleton. "That night we instantly clicked and wrote four songs." The next day Middleton dropped out of college and quit his day job to pursue the rock n roll dream.

For the next few years Royal Bliss built up a loyal fan base the old-fashioned way--on the road. The band recorded a demo and thanks to their hook-laden songwriting ability, synergy and stage presence they were able to sell over 8,000 CD's on their own.

In 2004, the band started to generate major label interest, but it all came to a halt when Middleton was seriously injured in a near fatal accident that left him paralyzed in a wheel chair. After months of rehabilitation, Middleton miraculously got back on his feet and was able to walk again (he still has only partial feeling in his right leg). The band regrouped and decided to push forward. They headed back into the studio for some of the most intense studio sessions they have ever encountered.

During the recording, tragedy ambushed the band again. Drummer Jake Smith flipped his car five times after leaving the studio one night and Harding sliced his face in half while skiing.

"It was crazy" states Richards. "Jake had just finished recording his drum tracks when he left the studio the night of the accident and I actually went with Chris on the skiing trip. I was skiing a different slope, so I didn't even realize that it happened until I saw him with his jaw wired shut."

After the smoke cleared, the band finally released their independent debut--the appropriately titled "After The Chaos II". Combining elements of classic rock and modern indie rock, the band received rave reviews and played shows across the U.S. Supporting artists such as Kid Rock, Maroon 5, Hinder, Three Days Grace, and Buckcherry.

After the initial release of "After The Chaos II" in 2005, The Control Group, an independent record company out of Seattle picked up the record and gave them a nationwide distribution deal. While the band had substantial radio success in the past, the albums first single "Devils and Angels" took them to a whole new level. A number of stations across the US including KHTB/SLC, KZDX/Idaho, KCVI/Idaho, KOMP/Las Vegas, WIIL/Chicago, and KEYJ/Abilene, TX started spinning the track and it instantly became a top requested song exploding Royal Bliss to 1 airplay at both rock and pop radio. "After The Chaos II" sold a staggering 12,000 units and at one point, their album was selling 1 at the Gray Whale music store chain (outselling numbers 2-5 by a combined total of nearly 8 to 1). At that time Virgin Records president Jason Flom took notice and immediately signed them to his new Capitol Music Group Label under EMI in May 2007.

That summer the band headed off to Portland, OR to record their major label debut "Life In-Between" with producer Rob Daiker.

"Working with Rob, we were finally able to record the way we wanted" states Middleton. "Our past recordings were done in a living room and a kitchen. This time around, we all recorded in the same room and captured the feel of the band". "There were multiple strip clubs to keep our head in the game" adds Richards with a smile.

"Life In-Between" is the band's most honest and personal material to date. "All of the songs are sculpted out of life's hard lessons." says Middleton. "We went in with 30 plus songs and narrowed the record down to 12."

When asked about the meaning behind the bands songs, Middleton explained "Devils & Angels" is about feeling like your stuck in the middle and having to make a choice. It's kind of like the old cartoons when the main character would have an angel on his right shoulder telling him to do the right thing and the devil would be on his left shoulder telling him to do the opposite. The song is just about internal struggles."

"We Did Nothing Wrong" was written about all the crazy shit that's going on in the world from a kids point of view. It's about war, global warming, and all the other stuff that the kids are inheriting from the older generation."

From the album starter "Save Me", written about Middleton's personal struggles with alcohol, drugs, and transition into adult hood to "Here They Come" about dealing with people trying to inflict their point of view on you, the album is filled with big riffs and memorable melodies that instantly get stuck in the minds of everyone who hears them.

The elements of life lie in the process and the adventure, these songs are the result of that journey, a place where tragedy and beauty can exist side by side, where every emotion is valid and every emotion is needed. Such is the essence of Royal Bliss.
